ivan petrella provides a bold new interpretation of liberation theology s present state and future possibilities in so doing he challenges a number of established pieties instead of staying within the accepted norm of examining liberation theologies individually as if they were closed worlds he dares develop a framework that tackles latin american black womanist and hispanic latino a theologies together instead of succumbing to the fashionable identity politics that rules liberationist discourse he places poverty at the forefront of concern instead of seeking to carve out a small space for theology in a secular world he shows that only an expansive understanding of liberation theology can deal with contemporary challenges the end result is a wake up call for liberation theologians everywhere and a radical new direction for liberation theology itself
