the growth of shareholder value has been a major change in western economies since the 1980s this growth has reignited debates concerning relations between investors and managers this book argues that investors are more than passive providers of finance on whose behalf managers seek to maximize shareholder returns instead many investors directly influence management practice through investor engagement the book examines the role of institutional investors and private equity firms two types of investors with overlapping but different reasons for engagement questions addressed include what are the incentives and disincentives for investment engagement how is investor engagement organized what areas of management practice are of particular concern to investors the discussion shows in detail how private equity firms play a major role in developing new companies beyond the provision of finance especially in the it biotechnology and pharmaceutical sectors the discussion is primarily based on british and us research the debate has wider international relevance because there are strong pressures for establishing shareholder value as the international norm for systems of corporate governance following a detailed discussion of germany the authors conclude that there is no inevitable trend to shareholder value shareholder value depends upon complementary institutional arrangements in national business systems which are far from universal the book concludes with a critical analysis of the justifications for shareholder value and investor engagement highlighting the weaknesses of both efficiency and equity justifications

all over the world companies play an important role in the economy different types of stakeholders hold the reins in these companies an important class are the shareholders that finance the activities of these companies in return stakeholders have a say on how these companies should be organized and structure their activities this is primarily done through voting and engaging these mechanisms of voting and engaging allow the shareholders to decide significant aspects of the company structure from who governs it to how much directors are paid however how shareholders vote and engage and how far their rights stretch are organized differently in different countries this pioneering book provides insights into what rights these shareholders have and how the shareholders of companies in nineteen different jurisdictions participate in corporate life through voting and engaging comparative and international in scope it pays particular attention to how jurisdictions align and differ around the world

we use an experimental setting to investigate the impact of investor engagement and management attitudes on the reporting and performance of climate change management our results show that engaged companies were more likely than the control group to improve both their climate change reporting and performance and that management recalcitrance significantly impeded improvement but did not eliminate the effectiveness of engagement the study contributes to the understanding of the role of shareholder activism in advancing environmental social and governance issues by offering evidence from non confrontational engagement by a relatively small institutional investor and by highlighting the role of management the study offers evidence to institutional investors that relatively small investment institutions can effectively engage with firms and change management practice without necessarily embarking on costly or time consuming programmes the results also have implications for targeting engagement for maximum effectiveness and for the design and implementation of policy and regulation to promote better carbon management this article summarizes the key practical insights and results from a study published by the authors in business and society it demonstrates that collaborative engagement with companies on environmental social and corporate governance esg issues provides institutional investors with material benefits including opportunities to share resources time and knowledge as well as to increase the weight of investors demands in the eyes of corporate management the article also notes that these collaborations come with typical barriers to collective action such as properly funding such initiatives the primary focus of the article is to explore the multiple roles that an organization such as pri can play to overcome these challenges and support the collaborative engagement process the authors begin by setting out a conceptual framework to address this question then describe the findings of three actual case studies in which pri played such a role in a setting of globalized financial capitalism an issue which has received little attention to date is not whether national models of corporate governance are converging or diverging but rather the channels by which market and regulatory forces interact to promote such convergence or divergence i herein propose the institutional investor interlocked directorate pipeline as one such channel of potential convergence in theory institutional investors impart tacit knowledge to a select group of corporations by means of engagement activities such knowledge and influence can subsequently be distributed to a wider corporate population by means of interlocked directorates originating from the engaged corporations an analysis of the distribution of these pipelines across Canada demonstrates that such pipelines can penetrate geo political and industrial boundaries and interact with regulatory forces in shaping models of corporate governance the wide distribution of such pipelines effectively transforms tacit knowledge originally conveyed by institutional investors to a geographically limited sample of corporations into explicit knowledge accessible across the country although a growing number of investors are engaging with sovereign entities on environmental social and governance ESG issues little academic research investigates this new form of investor activism applying universal ownership theory and drawing on eleven case studies of policy engagement this article analyzes what drives institutional investors to engage with government entities and what challenges they find in the process we identify a trend that investors conduct policy engagement to fulfill their fiduciary duty improve investment risk management and create an enabling environment for sustainable investments as for engagement challenges investors report the longer term horizon a perceived limited influence toward governments the need for capacity building for investors and governments the difficulty in accessing government representatives and possible accusations of interfering with national sovereignty this research contributes to the public policy and sustainable finance literatures and offers governments insights on the demands of the investment community
