although much of the recent writing on agrarian society in ireland has concentrated on the peasantry there also existed alongside the small farmers and still exists today another significant group of land occupiers these were extensive farmers commonly known as graziers or ranchers who held large tracts of land and engaged in cattle and sheep grazing in fact certain areas of ireland have been for generations mainly populated by graziers they have been a cornerstone of the cattle and sheep industry and thus a vital force in ireland s agricultural economy their importance grew as the country shifted from a tillage based to a pasture based economy during the nineteenth century yet until now graziers have not been the subject of extensive study here david seth jones examines the ranching system and its role in the far reaching political social and economic changes that overtook ireland during the late eighteenth nineteenth and early twentieth centuries much of his inquiry relates to the period from 1880 to 1914 which includes the rise of the so called eleven month system the land war the anti grazier agitation and the commencement of a program of land distribution the first part of this study considers the economic characteristics of ranch farming its development and the origins and position of the grazier in the rural community particular attention is given to the graziers dependence and influence upon the land market the latter part of the book examines how they responded to and were affected by the struggle for land reform and land distribution and it deals at length with the rise of the anti grazier agitation after 1900 and the ensuing program of distribution of ranch land the study concludes with an examination of why the graziers failed to gain acceptance in the irish agrarian community drawing upon a wide range of sources including rental and farm accounts and other personal records diaries letters notebooks daybooks as well as many official documents this long awaited highly original study sheds much needed light on the important role of the graziers in irish history it will be valuable reading for both scholars and students of irish economic social and political history david seth jones earned a ph d in politics from queen s university of belfast in 1977 for three years he served as a professional officer in the department of agriculture of the northern ireland civil service and for a further three years was a university lecturer in southern africa he is now senior lecturer in political science at the national university of singapore where he has taught since 1982

nearly all scholars divide genesis into primeval and patriarchal history though they debate the precise point of division one reason advanced to justify the division is a thematic shift in primeval history the narrator focuses on the origin and spread of sin as well as god s consequent curse and judgment on humanity in patriarchal history however the spread of sin theme falls off the radar of most scholars but these analyses of the primeval and patriarchal narratives are simplistic and inaccurate in fact the theme of human sin and the divine curse not only serve as the main themes of the fall narrative but they also continue to function as major themes in both the primeval and patriarchal narratives that follow more particularly human sin appears to increase at both individual and societal levels moreover just as the primordial sin threatened to derail the advance of god s kingdom and fulfillment of the creation mandate so the spread of human sin in postlapsarian history threatens to thwart god s redemptive plan which consists in the restoration of his original creational intentions for divine and human eschatological fullness this proves true even in the patriarchal narratives where the sins of god s chosen often threaten the very promise intended for their ultimate good these facts which the author attempts to demonstrate in the monograph not only have important ramifications for the unity of the genesis corpus but they also have important implications for the doctrines of sin justification and sanctification
